Heinkel He 219

The He 219 was a twin-engine night fighter with an exceptional performance. Unfortunately delays in production caused by the incessant day and night bombing of Germany prevented it from becoming a serious threat to Allied bombers. However, those He 219's that did reach service units proved highly effective and one night fighter ace, Major Braub, shot down five bombers in one sortie. The Heinkel He 219 was one of the few machines fast enough to catch the famous Mosquito, and its lethal armament proved a menace to the unarmed Mosquito which relied entirely on its speed to out-distance any pursuer. By 1944 the standard camouflage schemes of the German Air Force were being replaced by a bewildering collection of non-standard finishes depending on the speed with which the aircraft were pressed into service. Some went into action with crosses hurriedly applied over the factory primer. He 219's were painted in a variety of schemes including all-black aircraft, light grey overall with dark grey mottle, splinter pattern wings with mottle finish to the fuselage and some aircraft were painted with large areas of black and white, possibly to break up the shape and so avoid recognition.
